Delivery Format:
	X SEMINAR – in-person
Description:	In this course students draft and revise works of fiction and, through discussions of their work and that of established writers, gather a set of aesthetic criteria for thinking about literary prose and the place of their work within its traditions and possibilities. Classes will typically begin with a lecture and a discussion of the assigned readings for the week. The rest of the class will be devoted to in-class work. Most often this work will involve the planned, formal discussion of prepared writing. Each student will be responsible for providing at least one piece for formal discussion each term.
