Description:	Historically, comedy has a “low” reputation. In the Poetics, Aristotle argues that comedy is an imitation of low characters with some defect or ugliness. Aristotle’s remarks about comedy continue to shape our perception of comedy. In the Western tradition, the cultural practice of producing comedy as well as the critical study of comedy begins with classical Greek theatre. Thus, many comedic plays are on our reading list; these plays range from classical new comedy, romantic comedy, city comedy, comedy of manners, and comedy of the absurd. Art is a socio-cultural phenomenon, and as western societies have changed so too has comedy. Accordingly, in order to study such change, our course considers the manifestation of comedy in several historical periods and literary genres. Our course questions comedy’s low status as well as such concomitant assumptions that comedy cannot treat serious subjects and that its interests are the trivial and the common. Thus, we study these texts with the following questions in mind. What is comedy? What is the social function of comedy? What value does comedy have, and what values does it produce in our culture? What are our expectations of comedy and are they fulfilled? How are these expectations produced? What are the conditions under which comedy is produced? In order to better answer some of these questions, our course’s reading list also includes a selection of secondary and theoretical texts. Collectively, our readings further our understanding of comedy philosophically, historically, psychologically, and socio-culturally.
